As a driving force for economic development and innovation, the importance of science and technology has become increasingly prominent. This is for example underlined by the record numbers of R&D expenditures as well as patent applications and innovations in the fields of automotive, information and communication technology, robotics and the healthcare sector; and backed up by politics as Prime Minister Abe stated during CeBIT 2017 in Hannover: “[...] there are only three things that are important for the future of Germany, Europe, and Japan. Number one is innovation. Number two: innovation. And number three: innovation. [...]”. How is the transfer of knowledge and innovation from science / research clusters to industry / companies realized in Japan? Which cooperation projects exist to build the bridge and to effectively make results available? How could German clusters learn from these Japanese processes?

Speaker: Koichi Iwao, Manager, Pro-Cluster Kobe, Foundation for Biomedical Research and Innovation (FBRI)

Koichi Iwao graduated from Kobe City University of Foreign Studies and joined Kobe City Government in April 1994. He served as Assistant Manager for Business Development of Kobe Biomedical Innovation Cluster (KBIC), Kobe City Government. He has been Manager for the Pro-Cluster Kobe of the Foundation for Biomedical Research and Innovation, an organization funded by Kobe City Government for the promotion KBIC – the largest life science cluster in Japan comprising more than 300 healthcare-related companies and institutions.
